

MULES CURE BROKEN HEARTS!

by Cindy K. Roberts

When you're in love, euphoria allows you to feel special and life is good. You dance a little jig when you think no one is looking. You dream up silly and sweet little nothings to whisper into his ear the next time you see him. You look great, your jeans fit just right and you feel like a really hot number. You rate number one on his speed dial, he loves to show you off and you share tender moments. (Sigh.) Time has passed and now you are hardly noticed by your husband/boyfriend. He has become lethargic and your relationship is going nowhere. The last time you witnessed soft and tender, was the chicken breast you had for dinner last week. Like day old bread on the clearance rack, the love has gone stale. And this is not healthy.

Dry your tears, hold on to your spurs, there is a solution to this mess...true happiness and a proven remedy is one bray away. The passion may be lost but there is a sure-fire cure for a broken heart. That's right. I am talking one thousand pounds of galloping muscle, tail and ears dancing in the wind...fire and impulsion within every stride. Wearing shoes of iron and leather only on his back...it puts a whole new meaning to the word masculine. Feeling better? Nothing is as soothing to the ailing heart...than Alfalfa kisses and hot-steamy oat breath blowing down the back of your neck. He's fit, he's athletic, able to do the heavy work and he will trot into your life just to please you.

The wet, sloppy-apple kisses never grow old and he's always waiting for you at the gate. When he's hot and sweaty, he smells good. He pines for you and he often calls your name. He likes the way you dress no matter what you have on, he loves your hair and musses it up any chance he gets. He wants to be your sweetheart every day of the year. And the way you serve his meals, it drives him crazy!

He's passionate about the way you toss his hay, pour his grain and the water is always just right. He doesn't complain and you never argue. He will make you feel better during PMS and is forgiving after you've had an estrogen moment. He doesn't mind a whip on occasion and when you raise your voice, he listens. He's reliable and never moody. He loves you just the way you are.

He doesn't have control issues, doesn't care about football and will let you keep the remote control. He likes your radio station, the movies you pick and doesn't mind when you spend money. He likes a beer once in a while but he will never come back to the barn drunk. He may wander, hop a fence or two but he'll never cheat. He won't brag to the boys that he's been with you and he won't trash your reputation. He listens to you and if he had a credit card, I am sure he would buy flowers and candy for you often. When you are with him, it is better than a Zoloft day.

Studies show that many therapists agree; mules cure broken hearts. Reports reveal that nine out of ten doctors recommend keeping a mule in your barn for an all new healthier you. The next time you see your doctor, have him write out a prescription for 1000 milligrams of M-U-L-E. Ask your health care provider to be pre-approved for the hybrid plan. You will be glad that you did. Pass this onto a friend and she'll appreciate getting this information. In cowgirl spirit - Cindy K. Roberts.

WWW.EVERYCOWGIRLSDREAM.COM